The steamboat Tennessee had arrived there with Col. Titus and Lockridge, and the recruits under their command proceeded up the river in the steamer that had been repairing under the supervision of Col. Lockridge.

The Costa Ricans, 300 strong, were attacked at Cody's Point, at the mouth of the Peripagua, and defeated with a large loss. The American loss was trifling. The accounts state that the machinery of the steamer getting out of order, the expedition returned to Punta Arenas, when the necessary repairs were hurriedly made, and then started again. It was thought by the most sanguine that the friends of Walker would regain possession of the river within a week.
