

GEN. Henningson, one of the officers under Gen. Walker, arrived in New York last Thursday afternoon, and was received with noisy demonstration, and for the time was a lion.

It seems from the information in the New York papers, that Gen. Walker was jealous of some of his officers; they were jealous of him; and all jealous of each other, when their prospects were not all hopeless. Now they are out of their difficulty, they are each endeavoring to lay the blame of failure upon the actions or movements of the other. It is said on one side, that Col. Titus was not as brave as his friends had supposed he was, and a want of bravery in two or three instances had led to misfortunes. On the other side it is said that Walker was jealous and selfish, afraid of the growing popularity of Col. Titus, and behaved very ungenerously towards that officer. While all this feeling exists, Gen. Walker is received in New Orleans as a hero, and Gen. Henningson in New York, is welcomed with most extravagant enthusiasm.
